Liquid Crystal Polymer (Vectra®) High temperature Liquid Crystal Polymer (LCP) plastic exhibits excellent mechanical strength and dimensional stability, high dielectric strength and low coefficient of thermal expansion. Provided in a standard off-white color or

Material Properties Liquid Crystal Polymer (Vectra®)

The term liquid crystal (LC) is a very common term; people know it from liquid crystal displays of digital clocks and watches dating back to the 1970s. Since then, LCs have substituted nearly all traditional displays for portable devices such as personal computers, toys, cell phones, and more recently, for televisions.

Liquid crystals, like all other kinds of matter, are subject to thermal expansion. As the temperature rises, the average spacing between the aligned molecules of a nematic phase (see below) increases, thus causing the e-ray to be increasingly retarded with respect to the o-ray.

The liquid crystal polymer refers to the plastic molecules containing the structure of , thus LCP of different manufacturers has different functional groups of (R, RTM) and structures of (A^B) which lead to different processing properties and different heat resistances.
