Their knowledge of the outside world has remained for the most part utilitarian. On the other hand, from the time of its first acquaintance with nomads the outside world has been interested in different aspects of the lives of nomads and this interest, at first utilitarian and emotional, gradually became more academic.

Financing health in low-income countries Poverty magnifies the need for health care while shrinking the capacity to finance it. Low-income countries face 56 percent of the global disease burden but account for only 2 percent of global health spending (World Bank 2005; Mathers, Lopez, and Murray, forthcoming).
