Unenhanced MDCT and MRI, especially MRI, which provides superior soft-tissue contrast, are particularly useful in the detection of hemorrhage. Fat-suppressed T1-weighted MRI is highly sensitive to the paramagnetic effect of methemoglobin and thus to the presence of hemorrhage.

MDCT and MRI. In most emergency departments, MDCT is the fastest and most practical study for cervical spine injury following trauma. With this technique, a high-spatial-resolution thin-section axial data set can be acquired with reformats in the sagittal and coronal planes in algorithms optimised for evaluation of bones and soft tissues.

MRI is a critical follow-up study in patients with severe trauma to the cervical spine. MRI is the modality of choice for the assessment of extra-osseous injuries such as epidural haematomas and ligamentous disruption in patients with negative CT studies but a high index of suspicion for injury.

MRI was the most sensitive method in the diagnosis of injuries of the cruciate and collateral ligaments, menisci and cartilage peeling of the articular surfaces ( $P < 0.01$ ). MDCT and MRI were demonstrated to be more sensitive than X-rays for the diagnosis of insidious damage around the knee.
