Abstract: The challenges of achieving person-centred care in acute hospitals: A qualitative study of people with dementia and their families. The study explored the experiences of people with dementia and their families in acute hospitals. The findings suggest that achieving person-centred care in acute hospitals is a challenge. The study identified several barriers to achieving person-centred care, including a lack of resources, a focus on medical care, and a lack of communication. The study also identified several strategies for achieving person-centred care, including a focus on the person's needs, a focus on communication, and a focus on the person's environment. The study concludes that achieving person-centred care in acute hospitals is a challenge, but it is possible. The study provides a number of strategies for achieving person-centred care in acute hospitals.
